My Dear [[Forecast10]],

I've been reviewing your chart all morning and felt I should write you immediately because it's become clear to me that the path you're on is not the one destined for you.

But please don't panic, [[Forecast10]]. There is nothing so unusual about this. We all experience bumps in one the road of life. Sometimes we may even feel that we're lost or at a crossroads. We don't know what direction to go in and need help making difficult decisions. What I'm trying to say is that at some point we all need guidance, direction and help.

I have so many valued friends like you who've similarly gone off course in their lives that I've been able to help, so I know that I can help you, too. That's why I was so excited to be able to tell you that in just 24 days -- in time for the powerful solar eclipse, a very lucky moment in the astrological calendar and the very best day to start making major changes in your life -- you can embark down a path paved in the promise newfound peace and prosperity. And I have just the thing to guide you as you go.

Now, because you're a [[if str_prefix_i(AstSign, "a")]an [[else]]a [[endif]][[AstSign]] you already have the intuitive nature to take the road less traveled and use other forms of belief to help you achieve your every goal and dream, so what I've found for you today is a perfect fit for your [[AstrologyPerson]] nature. I'm so thrilled to tell you about this icon called an Inuksuk ("In-ook-sook").

May the Inuksuk be your rock and your guide that points you in the right direction and helps you reach your ultimate destination on the winding and often uncertain trail of life.

What is the Inuksuk?

The Inuksuk are the "living stones" or "human rocks." They are ancient navigational tools used for thousands of years by the Inuit people--who were referred to as "Eskimos" until the 16th century. Made to resemble humans, these towering pillars of solid stone dot an otherwise barren arctic landscape in Canada, guiding the way of weary travelers or those lost in the storm, or those looking for good hunting grounds.

Without the benefit of trees, or any other natural marker, these rock sculptures act as signposts to guide and lead the way. They were built even before there was such a thing as a compass, and still 1,000's of years later they stand tall, unharmed and standing the test of time. You will not meet an Inuit person today who is not familiar with the role of the Inuksuk.

These fabulous rock sculptures embody the spirit of the Inuit people

The Inuksuk is a metaphor of the strength of the enduring Inuit people who've existed for thousands of years in one of the harshest landscapes in the world, using these rocks as their compass and living at peace with nature. And that's just the beginning.

The legendary metaphor of the Inuksuk is lending a helping hand to those in need and also relying on the guidance on others. It represents our innate desire to support our loved ones as well as our need to be guided along the rocky road of life. No one can do it alone, but once we accept the leadership of others we can go anywhere we like and be the person we were meant to be.

Solid as a Rock

These are values, [[Forecast10]], that I hold dear to my heart. That's why I was so thrilled when I stumbled upon this absolutely marvelous talisman, like no other in the world, with such deep and meaningful symbolism of the ancient Eskimos.

This one is an original design, made of solid sterling silver. At (so many grams) it's quite a substantial and lovely piece. The design of the Inuksuk symbol carries over on the reverse side and this design is one of a kind. With it you can take all the power of those towering sculpture and wear it close to your heart.

Or you may wish to give the gift of guidance to a treasured friend. Rocks are sturdy and strong and withstand the harshest storms and whatever Mother Nature hands them. When we want to talk about someone who is always there for us, a loyal confidante or a partner in life, we say, "you are my rock." If someone is you're rock, there is no better gift than a portable Inuksuk. Or you may wish to give the gift of guidance to a treasured friend. Now is YOUR one opportunity to receive your very own personal Inuit so that you too may feel the oneness and strength of the spirit of the arctic tundra.

Let me help you navigate through life. Let me take you to the most barren and harsh, yet beautiful and promising landscape, where paths of life have been guided. Let's take you to a people who had no trails, no roads, not even a tree to mark the way, and yet each and every one of them found the source of their own life and lives out their destiny with utter power, the Inuit. And the true force that guides them is the ultimate power, protection and guidance of the Inuksuk.

And now I hope you are starting to see [[Forecast10]], just why I think this Inuksuk talisman is so powerful and so wonderful to behold and to own.

It captures the essence of humanity: community, brotherhood, friendship, love, guidance, hope, leadership, and trust. It reminds us of the value of working as a team, of relying on the help of others on our path, but also the value in asking for help and the value of becoming that leader ourselves.

Indeed the Inuksuk is such a rich is symbol of community and leadership that in 1989 it was made by an Inuit artist and put on the step of the United Nations as a symbol of global oneness. And today it's the image that of the 2010 winter Olympics that will take place in Vancouver.
